GETTING A HEARING.

We trust that Rev. Everard Digby of St. Agatha's, Finsbury, London, does not get conspicuously or embarrassingly in bad because he was master of ceremonies at the fight between Bombardier Wells, the heavy-weight champion of England, and Collin Bell, the heavy-weight of Australia, which was had in London.

Rev. Digby likes boxing. He indicated that by his expressions of admiration for the Bombardier, who is a highly nerved, highly proficient, clean and clever man with his fists, embarrassed by a point or two of organic weakness. He can't stand a mule's kick in the stomach without lying down and rolling up his eyes.

Rev. Digby, even in England, where men box without causing scandal, feared that his participation in a prizefight as master of ceremonies might bring him under criticism, but he explained that he was vicar in a parish in a little island in London where the ordinary moralities did not have much control. Young men verged toward the bestial and a parson traveled unrespected. Rev. Digby could not talk to the young rowdies of shameless street corners because they would not listen to a parson. He might have found ears among the heathen on other shores, but not among the heathen at his door.

The men, however, respect strength and skill to punish. When they learned that the parson was master of ceremonies at a championship fight, they began to take their hats off to him. When their hats came off there was a chance that their ears would be open.

Rev. Digby hopes that the Bombardier's fists have, in a way, opened the scriptures in St. Agatha's.—Chicago Tribune.

THE STORY OF A HOT BOX.

The axes of freight cars run in brass bearings, contained in the ugly, square iron boxes we see projecting from the centers of the wheels. The space in the box around the brasses is filled with cotton waste soaked in oil. Now, when a little sand gets into the bearings and the resulting friction heats them, there are all the materials for a fierce little conflagration which will "rage" for an hour or more, and produce flames several feet high.

This happened in East St. Louis recently. Before the incident was closed the hot box had started a fire in the warehouse of an express company which spread to other structures and caused a loss of more than $40,000.

How did it do it? Why, freight cars must, in the nature of things, be run up close to buildings for loading and unloading. And this particular structure was wood.

Wooden buildings have no business in a modern city. The facing up of such structures with brick "veneer" and the substitution of nonflammable material for shingle roofs are imperatively necessary, if we would reduce our fire hazard. With this should go the cleaning up of rubbish. If this fateful freight car had stood opposite a brick wall on ground clean of rubbish the burning box might have consumed the car, but it could not have hurt anything else.

Europe, speaking generally, doesn't have fires. Their annual loss per capita is insignificant compared with ours. And the reason is of the simplest. They don't build structures that burn readily.

This is the truest economy. We must learn it or go on loading ourselves with heavy insurance costs, heavy taxes for fire extinguishing organizations, heavy expense by reason of the derangement of business by fires and losses unmeasurable in money through the destruction of life.

Now, which is cheapest?—St. Louis Republic.
